

In God We Trust

There could not have been any better action words other than the ones chosen by the United States of America as seen in the inscription that is on the American dollar, which says “In God We Trust.”

The confession is very deliberate and bold, and it also attracts a commensurate energy in executing the action plan. Trust is not belief. It transcends the state of believing and acting what we believe, which is fate, to the level of total surrender to a force that controls the universe, which is called God. One critical and very important point to stress is that you don’t believe anyone that you don’t know let alone trust. So knowing each other intimately has to be in place before trust issues become relevant or applicable.

Who is God? In answering this question, multiple descriptions based on perceptions are welcome. One fact that is indisputable, regardless of whatever context or perspective is viewed from, is that God is one. With the understanding of who God is and in relation to the issue of trust, this is an adventure of no return. It is not a journey that sees the light at the end of the tunnel, but that which believes in lighting the tunnel from the takeoff point and as we go. One characteristic of this kind of mindset is the speed that accompanies the journey, for the brighter the path, the higher the speed.

When you are in trust, you are as well in the covenant. You already know whom you are in a relationship with, and that understanding prevents anxieties born out of doubts, for it is a place where doubts are doubted. One strong promise for those who trust in God is perfect peace with benefits such as good success and divine protection. Trusting is giving all, committing all eggs into one basket, peeling an orange, opening a can of Coke, and breaking the eggs. It is a commitment and not a contribution, which is sleeping in the midst of the storms, and seeing tomorrow as clearly as possible today, and living in the reality of the unseen.

When you are in trust, you have automatically been lifted above what ordinarily should have been your worries, and you are expected to have a zero tolerance for doubt and unbelief. I think with unbelief there will be failures and impossibilities with man, but these are not in God’s dictionary and therefore should not be expected in the camp of those who trust in God. They are clearly described and likened to Mount Zion, which abides forever and cannot be moved. That is who you are when you are in trust.

You are immovable, unassailable, and undefeatable. You are more than a conqueror. Those who trust in God shall not know shame. Keep trusting but trusting the God that you know intimately, for only those who do know their God shall be strong and do great exploits.
